Homework questions to discuss:
1) Choose two events or challenges that Sonia Sotomayor faced in her life. What decisions did she have to make because of those experiences and how did those decisions affect the rest of her life?

2) Choose two events or challenges that you have faced in your life so far. What decisions did you make as a result? What have been the consequences of those decisions? How might those decisions influence your college career at Eastern Illinois University?

Additional questions:
- What do Sotomayor’s descriptions of her childhood convey about Spanish-speaking communities in New York? In what ways are the hardships in her household—the lack of financial resources, her father’s alcoholism, and the tension between her parents—exacerbated by the strains of living in a marginalized society? What family or cultural traditions help mitigate the difficulties she and her family face? Are there traditions in other cultures including your own that serve the same function?
- When she learns she has diabetes, Sotomayor thinks, “I probably wasn’t going to live as long as most people...So I couldn’t afford to waste time” [p. 99]. What does her reaction reveal about the way Sotomayor views herself and the possibilities available to her? In what ways does it establish a pattern for her behavior throughout her life? What other life events, like Sotomayor’s chronic illness, can alter a person’s outlook?
- Sotomayor writes, “My father’s neglect made me sad; but I intuitively understood that he could not help himself; my mother’s neglect made me angry” [p. 16]. This is a child’s perspective of her life at the time. Is it fair? If so, in which ways and if not, what nuances of addiction and family’s responses are missing?
- How do her visits to Puerto Rico enrich Sotomayor’s appreciation of her background? What aspects of her time there give her a sense of pride? Why does the island’s physical beauty, the museum she visits, and the warm connections among her relatives affect her so deeply [pp. 40-48]? Compare her impressions as a child to her perspective as an adult [pp. 191-192]. Do visits, traditions, or other events evoke an appreciation of your own background?
- In describing the visit to her maternal grandfather, Sotomayor writes, “I have carried the memory of that day as a grave caution” [p. 49]. Why do you think her mother never spoke to Sotomayor about being abandoned as a child? Are there good reasons for keeping an unhappy past from one’s own children? Do you agree that “without acknowledgment and communication, forgiveness is beyond reach” or do you think that it is possible to forgive someone who is unable or unwilling to acknowledge their impact on your life?
- Sotomayor comes to understand her parents’ relationship as an adult when she learns the details of their backgrounds, courtship, and marriage [chapter seven]. Did aspects of her mother’s story surprise you? What insights did it give you into her character? Does her parents’ history give you a new perspective on Sotomayor’s strengths and ambitions? Does her parents’ history give you a new perspective on your own parents?
- When Sotomayor arrives at Princeton she finds “that many of my classmates seemed to come from another planet and that that impression was reciprocated” [p. 160]. What role does gender and ethnicity play in her sense of isolation and insecurity? What helps her adjust to the unfamiliar, often unfriendly, atmosphere of Princeton? Are there other means that she might have tried?
- In addition to the barriers women and minorities faced at traditionally male, white universities, students of Sotomayor’s generation faced the polarizing effects of affirmative action: “The Daily Princetonian routinely published letters to the editor lamenting the presence of ‘affirmative action students’”’ [p. 183]. What arguments can be made on either side for supporting or opposing affirmative action programs? Did the book assist you in understanding the debate better?
- In reviewing the repercussions of affirmative action, Sotomayor writes, “Much has changed in the thinking about affirmative action since those early days when it opened doors in my life and Junior’s. But one thing has not changed: to doubt the worth of minority students’ achievement when they succeed is only to present another face of the prejudice that would deny them a chance even to try” [p. 245]. Have the prejudices Sotomayor encountered changed over the ensuing decades? Are things better, worse, or the same?
- At Yale Law School Sotomayor met José Cabranes, whom she calls “the first person I can describe as a true mentor” [p. 224]. What does Cabranes represent to her? How do the mentors she meets at various stages of her life shape her approach to her role as a model for others? Do you have mentors in your life who have provided or now provide support in different ways?
- What does she learn at Yale and later as an Assistant DA in New York City and as a lawyer in private practice about the assumptions made about her based on her gender and ethnicity? In what ways do her experiences in both the public and private sectors defy her assumptions? What assumptions about yourself do you regularly encounter and how do you deal with them?
- Sotomayor describes several of the cases she took on at the District Attorney’s office and at Pavia & Harcourt. What do these descriptions contribute to the memoir? What insights do they offer into the workings of the legal profession as well as Sotomayor’s personal approach to the practice of law?

- Sotomayor writes candidly about her divorce [p. 280-285]. Are the difficulties she and Kevin faced common in relationships that begin during the teenage years or in situations where the wife is more successful than the husband? Discuss the regrets and self-criticism Sotomayor offers in describing the reasons for her failed marriage. Do you think she and Kevin could have had a successful marriage given their circumstances?

- How have Sotomayor’s strong attachments to her community, family, and friends shaped her personality and unique perspective? How do they reflect the attitudes she acquired growing up in a Puerto Rican culture? Are these attitudes that can be acquired in different ways?

- What different groups does Sotomayor identify with in the course of her narrative? How does her self-image change as she pursues her education and career? How does she define herself at the memoir’s end? How do you define yourself and your life?

- How would you describe the tone of My Beloved World? Talk about the effects of her touches of humor (including self-mockery); frank appraisals of herself and others; and informal style on your appreciation of her story. Are there aspects of her life you think she should have explored more fully?

Best practices:

Many faculty who have led Eastern Reads! discussions have found discussion carousels provide a great way to get all of the students involved. All ideas are shared and no one person can control the outcome of the discussion. You’ll need some sort of flip-chart or large area of paper (e.g., butcher paper), a way to hang these around the room, and magic markers for each student to use.

1. Using 20 students as an example, create four mixed groups by having people count off from one to four (making four groups of five students each).

2. Clearly label and number four discussion questions that you want to use on the flipcharts/paper posted around the room.

3. The students each go to their assigned number (1-4), read the question at their station, and individually record their responses directly on the flipchart/paper. Be sure to emphasize that this is NOT about group consensus but about individual responses. If a student agrees with another’s ideas, they should indicate their agreement by placing a check mark next to that idea.

4. Give each group about 5 minutes to read the question and record responses. At the end of five minutes, signal each group to move clockwise to the next station.

5. Participants should read responses already on the flipchart/paper and individually check off the ideas they agree with. They should also add their own ideas to the list. Continue the rotation until all four stations have been visited by all groups.

6. Have each group return to their original question, give the group time to read the new responses and check those with which they agree. Ask each group to give a 1-2 minute report of the top four or five answers to their focus question (ranking can be done by tallying check marks).

The entire process (including 5 minutes for welcome and explanation) should take approximately 45-50 minutes. This activity is great because it puts most of the participation on the students and not on the discussion leader(s).

There are also other, less structured ways of leading discussions. Many faculty simply sit around in a circle and ask students to contribute to the discussion. This usually works well if you have a group of active students. The student Prowl Leaders (if you request one) can help enliven the discussion. The freshmen often feel more comfortable relating to someone closer to their own age.

Useful websites:

- http://castle.eiu.edu/~eiureads/
- NPR interview, A Justice Deliberates: Sotomayor on Love, Health and Family
- Publisher’s website with resources
- Background information on Sotomayor published by The White House