Private James Harvey Kingery writes from Camp White, Oregon, where he is in Company M, 383rd Infantry, APO 96:

fantry, APO 96: "The 'Battle of Oregon' is over and our division is now in Camp White, after seven weeks on the desert. The other divisions of the Fourth corps went on their way to other camps. "The first five weeks were all dust,

"The first five weeks were all dust, sometimes so thick one could not recognize the troops in the seat of the truck opposite us. It was not all riding either as many long hikes were made, which is not so much pleasure in sand and dust ankle deep as a stroll in the back pasture.

stroll in the back pasture. "The absence of such details as washing windows, sweeping and mopping the floors was very much appreciated.

"On the way down we traveled through snow that was a foot deep, which had fallen ten days before. The weather here has been very nice the last few days, much like Indian summer in Illinois. This is a new camp built in a pretty much out of the way place.

the way place. "The third battalion of the 383rd Infantry regiment, representing the 96th division, was trucked down to Medford on Armistice day to put on a parade to show the civilian population what a tough and well trained outfit looked like. Weapons of the Infantry were put on display, with qualified parties in charge to answer the many questions of spectators."
