Technical Sergeant Franklin D. Jones writes his mother, Mrs. Anna Jones, of Newton, from somewhere on Luzon island in the Philippines: "We finally arrived here a few days ago but this is only another temporary station and we will not be here long enough to get any mail. I visited the city of Manila where Robert Robb worked. It is a mass of ruins but they are rebuilding it as fast as they can.

"I am enclosing some Jap invasion money, which is plentiful here and not worth the paper it's printed on. I can now begin to realize the destruction and suffering of war. No one in the United States can imagine what their War Bonds are doing until they see it. We should never kick about rationing because we soldiers really get everything you are giving up. The food is good.

"The weather is rainy and the ground is muddy. We sleep in tents, wash and shave out of our helmets, have the natives do our clothes and everyone does a job. I like it here fine because I like hot weather. Maybe I can lose a little weight.

"The natives here are very colorful and wear bright clothes. They come right in the camp and in your tents, selling pineapples, bananas and coconuts, which they carry in large woven trays balanced on their heads. The little boys call all of us Joe. I went to an open air show last night and had some nice entertainment."
